

A day in the life
during COVID-19.

The pandemic of the novel coronavirus required several mandates to be in affect such as social distancing and self-isolation. The sudden closures of schools, workplaces, and recreational areas has made people adapt to the current crisis. The images were taken during the first week of quarantine throughout various areas of southern California.

Genaro Grajeda plays video games while visiting his aunt and uncle in Riverside, Ca. on Monday, March 16. Grajeda usually attends Bing Wong Elementary in San Bernardino, but since the pandemic, the school is closed and has requested that students partake in the mandated quarantine to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

Richard Caldera Sr. sits in his room on March 16 in Riverside, Calif. streaming a series on his Smart TV. Only a few days in quarantine, Caldera has adjusted to staying inside by also doing indoor chores and playing with his great-granddaughter when she is over to visit.

Jonathan Mendoza washes his hands as he prepares to make lunch for his nephew who is visiting on Monday, March 16. Hand washing is one method to prevent contracting the novel coronavirus. The CDC recommends washing your hands thoroughly for about 20 seconds.

Zissou, an 11-year-old Yorkshire Terrier, waits by the front door to be walked by his owner, Richard Caldera Sr. on March 16. Caldera is unable to take Zissou on their daily walk as the novel coronavirus is spreading throughout Riverside County. He must remain indoors as he is susceptible to the virus because of his age and underlying conditions.

Emma Lily Felix remains indoors at her great-grandmother's house in Riverside, Ca. on March 16. Felix is usually allowed to play outside or go to her local park, but because of the cold weather and pandemic, she must stay inside as much as possible. "Social distancing" may have cognitive and behavioral affects for many people because of the lack of stimuli and social interaction amongst others.

Felicia and Joshua Felix work from their home as a precaution to spreading the novel coronavirus or contracting it on March 18 in Jurupa Valley, Ca. Not many job industries allow employees to work from home, leaving many without jobs throughout this critical time.

Grocery shelves are empty at a Target store in Lake Elsinore, Calif. on Friday, March 20. Panic shopping has emptied many stores of their inventory as people fear food shortages during the novel coronavirus pandemic.

A shopper walks down the aisle in protective barriers while out with the general public at the Lake Elsinore Target store on March 20. As the virus spreads throughout the U.S., many feel unsafe while getting the essential needs of their household and usually wear protective gear so as to prevent contracting COVID-19.

Jonathan Mendoza delivers a few canned items and a small bag of flour to his grandparents, Natividad and Lauro Avina, who live in Lake Elsinore. They are quarantined inside their home during the novel coronavirus pandemic. The shortage of food at local supermarkets has made it challenging for susceptible people to get basic food essentials in their homes.

A hearse drives down Van Buren Boulevard in Riverside, Calif. on Friday, March 20 amidst the novel coronavirus pandemic. Vehicles and motorcyclists escorted the vehicle through the main road, while flashing their hazard lights to notify surrounding vehicles of their slow pace.
